This picture depicts a runner about to cross the finish line of a race. The expression on his face is that of victory (as the line is not broken, thus he is the first to reach it) and satisfaction as he has won the race. This can be applied to our lives whereby we set personal targets for ourselves to work towards to ensure that we are always moving forward and not backwards. A friend who was once an athlete told me that his school did not send him to start the race, but to finish it.

The fact that a simple graphic calculator is able to produce such a intriguing picture is simply fascinating. I have learnt many GC commands and functions that I hardly used in my Maths lessons.
